FEATHERS IN THE WIND

I know that this will come as a shock to many of you, but I have not written the "great American novel, "nor have I won the Nobel Prize in Physics, however, I am capable of counting past the number 20. This brings me to my article—my war with the Golden Arches Supper Club.

We might as well all admit to having eaten at a fast-food restaurant at one point in our lives. They are handy, inexpensive, and somewhat satisfying. My problem comes with ordering the chicken nuggets. The first time I was upset because, instead of getting regular honey I got honey mustard. Ok, maybe I was misunderstood on the speaker. After all, I have trouble understanding what the cashier says until the printout flashes on the order board. Even then I questioned if they read "honey" and not "honey mustard," but so be it. We drove off as I muttered.

Then came the time when I ordered the ten nugget pack. It was a mistake to order that many for one person, but I was hungry. Graciously, the cashier gave us two packets of honey, which led me to think that honey was at a premium or perhaps "Arches" was saving it for an emergency. It also seemed that I had received fewer than ten pieces. I thought that because I was hungry, I had really eaten them all too quickly. Then I thought again and felt perhaps I had been shorted. Everyone makes mistakes, so after a few weeks, we tried again. It happened again! I was not going to be fooled, so, on the third attempt, I ordered six. Upon opening the box, I counted five, so I showed it to Charlemagne just to prove my point. He, too, counted give pieces of chicken and asked if he "should go back." "What is the use?" I figured. First the honey, now the chicken. Oh, well.

People have been complaining about restaurants and prices ever since the pandemic. Frankly, I am tired of it all, and am happy to go to, of all things, a funeral luncheon at the Ox Yoke and see not only a specially printed menu but a wonderful tribute to the deceased. You feel like your presence is worth something. B.S.H.
